

than phantasms. Hers is an alienated perception. The items in these paintings are mostly seen close-up, tightly cropped, and yet without minute detail, as if everything is too near to the eye for us to focus on. The effect is claustrophobic, and the rare promise of deep space is abrogated: The corridor shown in Hallway, 2021, is narrow, without side entrances or windows, and leads only to a door that appears to float at some unattainable distance; the walls seem to close in on you like an Edgar Allan Poe nightmare. And you can't actually see outside in Bouquet on Windowsill, though if you can in Window at 11pm, both 2021, you are able to only exiguously.

In these paintings, we see so much, but never quite the thing itself. One was tempted to consider Drain, 2020, a sort of portrait of the eye—a receptacle into which everything flows indifferently, leaving only some traces of foam. And yet what resists the eye yields to the hand: The painter's brush seems to meet all objects as familiar. It's not her gaze—contrary to what artist and writer Meredith Sellers says in the exhibition's press release—but rather her touch that is, to borrow Sellers's words, “gently caressing [the depicted objects] with soft light and shadow.” Porter's painterly facture always reminds us that, even if her images are only contingent apparitions whose apparent companionship is deceptive, the act of painting offers us the possibility and pleasure of knowing them, stroke by stroke.

—Barry Schwabsky

Franklin Evans

MILES McENERY GALLERY

The titles for the paintings in Franklin Evans's exhibition “fugitivemisreadings” were made up of lowercase letters jammed together into solid blocks, like the stream-of-consciousness “thunderwords” in James Joyce's Finnegans Wake (1939), or the file names of PDFs scattered over a Mac desktop. In one canvas, Evans paid tribute to Henri Matisse's famous pastoral of 1905–1906, The Joy of Life, by hand copying the composition's Fauvist figures and rearranging them as if he were using the cut-and-paste function in Photoshop. The work is called . . . wait for it . . . joysdivision (all works cited, 2021). Yes, the name of this Matisse remix is a callback to everyone's favorite short-lived New Wave postpunk act from Salford, England. Why so? Was the pun just irresistible? Or is there something tellingly ambivalent about associating Matisse with one of the bands mentioned over the course of LCD Soundsystem's eight-minute epochal rhapsody of hipster affectation, “Losing My Edge” (2002)?

A recurring element in Evans's paintings are crisp acrylic lines that resemble taut strips of masking tape. In previous exhibitions, Evans employed actual colored tape to extend his picture plane into three dimensions, covering the walls and floors surrounding his canvases with pictures, press releases, spreadsheets, and other printed matter. The artist's use of tape led to his interest in Piet Mondrian's braided-line compositions of the 1940s, but a more apposite point of comparison might be the tape-encrusted installations of Thomas Hirschhorn. The Swiss artist's ersatz memorials to Georges Bataille or Antonio Gramsci reflect what Hirschhorn himself has described as a “fan” mentality that celebrates philosophers with a frenzied devotion usually reserved for sports teams or pop stars. The profusion of references to Matisse throughout “fugitivemisreadings” radiated a similar degree of unchecked enthusiasm. Why does Evans keep copying The Joy of Life? He's a fan!

But what does it mean to be a fan of modernism? Like Joy Division, modernist painting circa 1900 teeters perpetually at the edge of relevance. Even the era's most eminently cancelable “master,” the predatory Paul Gauguin, continues to exert a generative influence on contemporary painters (e.g., Chris Ofili and Sanya Kantarovsky). Yet

Franklin Evans,
joysdivision, 2021,
acrylic on canvas,
30¾ × 32⅞".

Post-Impressionism and Fauvism are now also thoroughly commodified fodder for coffee mugs and mouse pads, the pictorial equivalent of dad rock. Evans's direct citations of famous paintings play on this double aspect. At times, these snippets offered little more than the middle-brow pleasure of winning a name-that-tune contest. At other times, “high” modernism became a measuring stick for gauging the historical specificity of feeling human. For instance, Evans's representation of his own work space, titianatilt, calls out for comparison with Matisse's Red Studio, 1911. Both scenes are populated with nods to other Matisse paintings, but whereas the nested images in The Red Studio afford the eye moments of rest before it resumes its ambit over the canvas's rusted-red expanse, titianatilt shows a pile of printed-out JPEGs on a candy-striped floor so densely packed with visual stimulation that gaining one's bearings is nearly impossible. The interior becomes a vivid portrait of an information-added twenty-first-century mind.

For three large-scale canvases in “fugitivemisreadings,” Evans dispensed with his masking-tape lattices in favor of dollop-laden biomorphic patterns that serve as backdrops to swirling medleys of modernism's greatest hits. In one, decenteringfacespace, apples lifted from Paul Cézanne's works float beside the decapitated heads of the skull-faced boys in the Matisse paintings Music, 1910, and The Piano Lesson, 1916. This same painting also contains small-scale portraits of Frederick Douglass and Martin Luther King Jr. How should one understand these respective nods to the abolitionist and civil rights movements in the welter of Evans's art-historical references? Perhaps they mark the limits of fandom in grappling with the barely latent racism of modernist aesthetics. Or perhaps they are expressions of a sentiment that vinyl aficionados and museum curators alike have lately been muttering under their breath: Damn, my collection is just . . . so . . . white.

—Colby Chamberlain

Milford Graves

FRIDMAN GALLERY

The fundamental task of a musician, according to Milford Graves (1941–2021), was in many ways straightforward: “We're here to make